PRESS RELEASE

The Changing Face of Divorce

Bill Simpson of Azimuth Financial Planning, LLC of Portsmouth, recently attended two days of Collaborative Law training. Collaborative Law, most commonly used nationwide in the resolution of divorces and other disputes, is a growing practice in New Hampshire's current climate of shrinking budgets and court closures. Collaborative Law is a non court method of resolving disputes privately with the help of trained professionals without the expense of court.

Collaborative Law trained professionals work together as a team. Lawyers help their clients determine and advocate for their needs. Mental health professionals lend support and direction as "coaches" meeting the often times overlooked emotional needs of participants that court-centered dispute resolution is not equipped to address. Financial professionals assist in gathering and analyzing information in order to reach a sustainable resolution. This process becomes a binding court order as if made by a judge, but relies on the participants' knowledge of themselves, their families and their respective needs to determine the best path for the parties and their families.
